Semicolons (;)

Semicolons establish a pause longer than a comma, but shorter than a period. Use a semicolon to

1) connect two independent clauses that have a strong connection. Independent clauses include a subject and a verb, and can function as complete sentences.
   • Example: Some people enjoy watching hockey; others prefer to watch basketball.

2) link two independent clauses when using a conjunctive adverb (words like however, therefore, or nevertheless) or a transitional phrase (like on the other hand, or in contrast)
   • Example: Chen’s friends all owned cars; in contrast, she preferred public transportation.
     (Note how the transitional phrase is typically followed by a comma.)

3) separate items in a long series or list, especially when including details about the items on the list. Often, this type of list will be initiated by a colon (‘:’).
   • Example: He ran into many familiar people at the concert: Pablo, a Psychology student he had befriended in his first year at university; Maria, his former girlfriend; and Khai, his father’s best friend.
More on Semicolons:
University of Wisconsin: https://writing.wisc.edu/handbook/grammarpunct/semicolons/

A resource created by Tristin Barker for

https://kings.uwo.ca/writeplace

2019